WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

The southwest-northeast oriented high pressure ridge aloft lies right over Northern California today. It will likely cause Wednesday to be both the warmest and driest day of the week for much of the Geographic Area. Maximum temperatures climbed to the low or mid-80s in warmer low inland valleys yesterday, and that figure could exceed 90 degrees in the warmest spots today. Humidity inland dropped down late Tuesday to reach a 12-25% range inland, a significant drop from what most areas saw Monday. In some of the Mid Coast, Mendocino Predictive Service Area, and nearby areas, relative humidity showed even further drops last night, in a generally poorer to moderate nighttime recovery pattern. The fairly widespread north-northwest to east-northeast winds of Tuesday has transitioned to more of a northeast to east and will cover less ground than yesterday. Once these winds lighten up later today, they will fade away for the most part when opposed by upslope heating breezes. The weather of Thursday through midday Saturday will still be governed mainly by high pressure, though it will be a slightly weaker version of the ridge. A weakened Pacific weather system looks like it will clip the northwest part of Northern California on Sunday, and it now looks a little wetter for the Northwest Mountain Predictive Service Area than it did yesterday. After a short-lived ridge next Monday to midday Wednesday, the latest Global Forecast System model run shows a wetter, more widespread weather system during the second half of next week. However, the model's track record this year cautions us to keep forecast confidence on that possible event, below normal for now.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Gusty north winds will continue today across several sections of the district as a weak low continues to move eastward into Arizona. Expect north winds of 15-25 mph with occasional gusts to 35 mph across the Owens Valley and northern deserts as well as the I-5 Corridor and Northern Los Angeles County. A weak northeast gradient at the surface will allow several degrees of warming today; highs will climb 5-8 degrees over most locations under mostly sunny skies. Thursday and Friday, the flow will shift to the northwest and increase which will bring gusty winds of 20-30 mph to the central coast region. A deep marine layer will likely develop south of Point Conception with widespread night and morning stratus extending to the lower coastal slopes by Friday morning. Temperatures will cool off a few degrees south of Point Conception while other areas remain near seasonal averages. Early next week, a ridge is expected to build over the area, leading to drier and warmer weather. Highs Sunday through Tuesday may be close to 90 degrees in the lower foothills and valleys. A trough may bring much cooler weather and a chance of rain to Central California toward the end of next week. No strong offshore winds are expected the next seven to ten days.
